Introduction

This is a seminar on American Political Development. The course exposes students to a number of topics related to the application of political science to American history.

Topics to be investigated include American Political Development as subfield, power, the state, race, liberalism, Congress, the presidency, the judiciary, the effects of war, and policymaking. The seminar features a number of critically acclaimed books, articles, and book chapters in the field of American political development, some more recent and others, classics.

We “read around” American political development. This is to say that we read widely—and not only in political science, but also in law, sociology, geography, and history.

Doing so will provide a fuller picture of the terrain political science covers and possibly inform future research topics. We will also read scholarship that with contrasting political and ideological implications.

The seminar will examine levels-of-analysis issues, and inquire about the uses of evidence and sources. It will implicitly consider the comparative dimensions to institutional changes in US politics and government.
