What's wrong with American politics? Those who follow politics are familiar with the litany of complaints – populism, polarization, inequality, money, special interests, corruption, disengagement, lack of deliberation, lack of accountability... Both liberals and conservatives find much that is wanting – though, naturally, they don't always agree on what it is.

Although normative questions are usually downplayed in political science, we place them front and center as a way of motivating the course. Specifically, we shall try to identify potential problems with American politics, to conceptualize them clearly, to measure them in a systematic fashion, to chart their history, to compare their status in other countries, to understand their causes and their effects, and their possible solutions. In short, we shall try to apply social science to the apparent problems of American politics.

Eligibility

This is an upper division course in political science (aka government). I expect that some students will be avid political junkies. All students should have taken at least one introductory course in American politics. If you're unsure about the basics, review a textbook on American politics.

You should be aware that this class will require a good deal of time and effort on your part. If you are unable to make this time-commitment you may be happier in a different course.

Grades

Grades will be based on the following components: (a) attendance (10%), (b) classroom participation (10%), (c) pop quizzes on the day's reading (20%), (d) final exam (20%), (e) oral presentation (5%), (f) first draft of research paper (5%), final draft of research paper (30%). Note that many of the grading points are assigned at the end of the semester.

Protocol

Please arrive on time. Do not read, sleep, or chat with your neighbors. Put your cell phones away. If you need to use your laptop to access readings or to take notes do not surf the web or use email. To discourage this, I ask that everyone keep their eyes focused on the front of the class unless looking at an assigned reading. Be respectful of others in your comments. Do not leave until class is dismissed.

Academic conduct

Each student in the course is expected to abide by the University of Texas Honor Code:

“As a student of The University of Texas at Austin, I shall abide by the core values of the University and uphold academic integrity.”

This means that work you produce on assignments, tests and exams is all your own work, unless it is assigned as group work. The instructor will make it clear for each test, exam or assignment whether collaboration is encouraged or not. Always cite your sources. If you use words or ideas that are not your own (or that you have used in previous class), you must make that clear otherwise you will be guilty of plagiarism and subject to academic disciplinary action, including failure of the course. You are responsible for understanding UT's Academic Honesty Policy:

http://deanofstudents.utexas.edu/sjs/acint_student.php

Absences, extensions

Students are expected to take exams and complete written work at their scheduled times. By UT Austin policy, you must notify me of your pending absence at least fourteen days prior to the date of observance of a religious holy day. If you must miss a class, an examination, a work assignment, or a project in order to observe a religious holy day, you will be given an opportunity to complete the missed work within a reasonable time after the absence.

The syllabus

The syllabus is laid out in as organized a fashion as I could manage. However, the problems of American politics do not always resolve themselves into tidy categories. Indeed, there is a lot of overlap across these topics. This means that suggested readings listed for one class meeting may be relevant for another. (In a few instances, I have listed the same study twice.) It also means that our class discussions – and your research topics – may not be limited to just one topic, as listed below.

Finally, it is important to note that the syllabus is likely to undergo small adjustments as we proceed, e.g., changing dates for presentations, new background readings, and so forth. The most recent draft of the syllabus will be posted in Canvas. (If there are especially important changes, e.g., to deadlines, I will notify everyone through Canvas.)

Readings

Assigned readings, as well as many of those listed as background, will be posted on Canvas or available online.

Some of these readings are written for a broad audience and should be easy to understand. This is generally the case for books and articles published in popular venues.

Academic journal articles may be more challenging. You will get practice reading academic scholarship through the course of the semester. In any case, you can always get the main point of the author's argument and evidence even if you do not follow the details of the methodology (which I'm happy to help with). Abstracts, introductions, and conclusions are usually straightforward and non-technical.

For each substantive (non-methodological) reading, I would like to try to address the following issues. This will structure our discussion and also familiarize you with the terminology of social science analysis, and its various applications.

Argument:

Descriptive:

Concept definition

Measurement (Is it precise, valid, and consistent with the concept?)

Typology (various sorts)

Synthesis

Causal:

Outcome of theoretical interest

Cause(s) of theoretical interest

Characteristics:

Clarity (What is the envisioned variation on X and Y, background conditions, and scope-conditions?)

Manipulability (Is the causal factor manipulable, at least potentially?)

Precedence (Is X separable from Y and prior to other causes of Y?)

Impact (How much of the variation in Y can X explain?)

Mechanism (How does X generate Y?)

Research design:

Type:

Experimental

Observational

Characteristics:

Covariation (Does X co-vary with Y?)

Comparability (Are observations causally comparable to each other? Are there confounders?)

A PARTICIPATORY APPROACH TO LEARNING

The first several meetings of the course follow the traditional educational format. We read sections from a methodology textbook and I will do a fair bit of lecturing. The format is good for imparting lots of information but not very good at eliciting original thought or honing writing and presentational skills. After that, we will adopt a very different format. Since it is unfamiliar, I want to explain the rationale in some detail.

The hallmark of a good education is not the facts you learn but your ability to learn new facts and analyze those facts – to take a problem and work through it on your own or in the company of your peers, and to present your solution. This is what employers are looking for in the modern workforce, where most (well-paying) jobs demand creativity, analytic skills, independent learning, and skillful presentation – not rote memorization and highly repetitive, structured assignments.

To facilitate this, we will flip the traditional classroom in the remainder of the course. I will begin each class by leading a discussion based on the day's topic and reading. To participate meaningfully you must have done the reading. To encourage this, and to reward those who are conscientious, there will be periodic pop quizzes based on the assigned reading for that day.

Note that readings are chosen with an eye toward stimulating discussion. Some of the readings were originally published in academic journals; others were produced for books or other popular venues. I am sure you will notice the difference, and I hope you will learn to appreciate the virtues of different sorts of writing.

All of the assigned articles and book chapters may be flawed in some way; indeed, all work is flawed or limited in some way. It is our job to identify the strengths and weaknesses, extensions and limitations, of each reading.

After our class discussion (about midway through the session), I will turn over the class to a student who will present their own work on a topic related to that week's general subject. There may also be time for discussion after the presentation.

You will find that my approach to readings, discussion, and presentations is very predictable. I will push you to identify the main argument of the reading and then to critique that argument. Frequently, I will play devil's advocate – taking the opposite side of whatever issue is being discussed.

During general discussion I will push you to formulate general arguments (e.g., Why is polarization growing?) and then to defend that argument (Why do you think X is the cause of polarization? How do you know it's true? What evidence can you provide? What sort of evidence would address this question? How could one research it?) Ditto for your own presentations. The emphasis of this course is on thinking and analysis, not the accumulation of facts. It is like a graduate seminar in this respect.

Our discussion will inevitably draw on current events. The proper noun "Trump" will appear regularly, I suspect. But I also want our discussion to move beyond current events, to discuss broader trends and their causes and effects. That's what distinguishes social science from journalism. We need to distinguish the idiosyncratic features of a situation from those that are systematic (general, iterated, non-accidental).

I expect active participation from all students, within the constraints imposed by class size. You will not be able to "free ride." Do not think of participation simply as a matter of "saying something." There are insightful comments and questions, and there is irrelevant drivel. You know what I'm getting at. Be especially judicious in the use of anecdotes drawn from your personal life. Sometimes, they are relevant to the subject matter; sometimes, not.

Let me say a word about my own responses to your comments. You should realize that any instructor who incorporates discussion into classroom activity is in an awkward position. I want to encourage open and frank discussion but I must also be sure to correct any misperceptions that arise from such discussion. If a comment is factually or logically wrong I will call attention to it. The purpose is not to embarrass the speaker but simply to clarify the point – for that person and for everyone else, many of whom may share the confusion.

Making mistakes is part of the learning experience. If you do not allow yourself to make mistakes you are preventing yourself from learning. I make mistakes all the time. There is nothing wrong with a wrong answer. Oftentimes, the most productive sort of answer or question is one that reveals what is not clear in people's minds. It is problematic, however, if your answer reveals that you have not done the assigned reading or that you have not been paying attention to previous class discussion.

Please be attentive to standard rules of decorum: avoid dogmatism, respect others' views, and try to move class discussion forward (pay attention to what others say and respond to the previous point).

RESEARCH ASSIGNMENT

At the beginning of the semester you will choose a general topic area – falling within one of the substantive categories identified on the syllabus (anything but the “methods” segment). This is the week when you will present your project – assuming the slot is not taken. (I will try to accommodate people's choices but would prefer to have everyone work on different topics – bearing some resemblance to the syllabus.)

Questions you might consider...

Once you have signed up for a section (e.g., “polarization”) browse the background readings (most of which are posted in Canvas) and think about what you might focus on.

Questions include (but are not limited to)... What is the problem, exactly? How should it be defined, conceptualized? How can it be measured? What is its history and possible future course (the latter of course is speculative so it shouldn't be the main subject of your paper)? How does it play out at international, national, state, and local levels? (Is there evidence of the phenomenon in Austin or at UT?) How does the situation in the US compare with other countries? (Is the US typical or exceptional?) What are the possible causes? What are the possible effects?

For any of these questions (or some others), you might focus on scholarly debates about a topic. What is the basis of the disagreement? (Are scholars looking at different aspects of a problem? Are they using different sources? Do they have different interpretations of the data? Are they using different methodologies?) Do you think one side is right and the other wrong? (If so, why?) Is it possible to reconcile contending views?

You might limit yourself to a review of the secondary literature (published articles and books). Or you might gather some original data, which might be qualitative or quantitative. If you have some experience working with quantitative data that opens up lots of possibilities, and we are happy to assist.

If you wish, you may conduct a survey experiment. (Since you will not be publishing the results of your research you do not need to apply for IRB approval. However, you should think through any relevant ethical concerns involved in using human subjects.) As subjects, you might recruit fellow students at UT. To administer the survey, you might use an online platform such as Qualtrics, for which UT has a subscription. (There are some limitations on the student license but this shouldn't be a problem.) As outcomes of interest, you might think of party preferences, ideology, or turnout. (If this is an election year you could administer your treatment prior to the election and then re-survey subjects after the election to record their voting behavior.) For some examples focused on turnout, see Maricruz Ariana Osorio, Melissa R. Michelson, "College students have been voting at record rates. Why?" Monkey Cage at WaPo (<https://www.washingtonpost.com/politics/2022/08/30/college-student-voting-midterms/>).

If your research involves some data analysis, you are free to use any software you please. Excel allows for some limited operations. Stata and R are much more advanced and will allow you to do anything you might want to do. Stata is probably easier to learn for those who are just starting out, and UT has a license that you can use – but only through an online system accessed through VPN. Ask the IT people if you have trouble figuring out how to get access. R is open-source and therefore free but you will have to download a copy. The final section of the textbook offers some guidance with respect to statistics, if you have not had a course in the subject or if you want to refresh your memory.

General advice

The key thing is to find something to focus on. You cannot address all of the foregoing questions. Nor can you possibly address all facets of a problem, as listed on the syllabus for each week of the course. The more focused your topic is, the better (within reason). You need to find some small piece of a puzzle, or some angle, that can provide the focus of a short research paper that is distinctive in some way relative to what has already been written on your subject.

The goal is to produce an original research paper, where you bring something new to the subject – a new perspective, a new argument, a new way of reconciling existing debates, new empirical material,... It must have your stamp on it.

Whatever you do, you must consider the methodological angles, the topic of Section I of the course. This means reviewing the strength and weaknesses of extant work, as well as your own (if there is an empirical aspect to your paper). Many debates in American politics boil down to methodological issues. Should we accept the correlation between money and voting behavior in Congress as a sign of the (causal) influence of money? How can we play out the counterfactual (a member's behavior if s/he didn't receive a campaign contribution from a corporation or individual)?

When citing a study, the presenter will need to be able to answer questions about its methodology. It is not sufficient to note that it was published in a peer review journal with lots of fancy tables and graphs. This is why the first section of the course on social science methodology is so important.

If you are making a causal argument, you should lay out the experiment – real or imaginary ("magic wand") – that tests your argument. If you are unsure what an experiment is, or what a causal argument is, please re-read the relevant chapters in the textbook. If still unclear, speak with me.

Sources ("the literature")

In putting together your presentation and paper you should survey the literature on the topic – books and articles, with special attention to scholarly work. State how your argument builds on, or argues with, extant work. This is important. You must differentiate your contribution from what others have done.

To get you started, I have listed background sources for each topic on the syllabus. This list of sources is not intended to be comprehensive, nor is it necessarily representative. I have privileged recent work over older work, and studies that seemed fairly comprehensive over those that are more targeted. Even so, this list of sources (which it took me a long while to compile) should offer a jumping-off place for your paper. Make sure you review the listed background sources and cite them in your paper – if they are relevant.

Wherever possible, PDF copies of the articles and books are posted on Canvas. Articles, in any case, should be available electronically from the library homepage. And books not posted on Canvas should be at the library.

Note that just because a source is relevant to your topic does not mean that you need to read it from beginning to end. It means that you must read in a focused, strategic manner.

I encourage you to spend more time on academic sources than popular sources. Of course, it is interesting to see what journalists, pundits, and bloggers have to say. Feel free to consult social media. Sometimes, it's informative; sometimes, it's merely dogmatic. You be the judge.

Although this is not a course on current events, you should stay on top of what's going on in US politics. For general coverage and commentary see the New York Times or the Washington Post.

Beyond textbooks, academic work appears in a variety of university presses and in journals, most of which are available electronically through the library and many of which are hosted in JSTOR.

Search for published work on a subject with Google Scholar or on the university library homepage. If you find a source that is right on topic, take a look at the sources that it cites (usually in a list of references at the end of the book or article) and the sources that cite it (which Google Scholar and Web of Science allow you to do).

First draft

You are required to hand in a first draft. It must be at least five pages, single-space. It will be graded on a four-point scale: 0=not handed in, 1=minimal, 2=decent job, 3=well done.

The only reason we are grading it at all is to incentivize students to write a rough draft, and to put some time into it. In the past, many students never submitted a first draft and suffered for it. Think of the draft as a potential “do-over.” You write a paper, the instructor grades it and offers advice on how to improve it. Then, you have an opportunity to improve it to get a better grade. What could go wrong?

Well, the process works only if you commit to it. In order to get something out, you must put something in. If you don't spend much time on your draft the comments you receive will be about weaknesses you are already aware of (e.g., there's no thesis, you haven't surveyed the relevant literature, your evidence doesn't support your claims, the writing is sloppy). You won't learn much from this.

If on the other hand you spend a lot of time on your draft, to the point where you think the paper is pretty good, you will learn a lot about how to improve it for the final draft. Also, the better the draft, the less work you need to do at the end of the semester when time is generally at a premium.

Suggested outline

Most academic work adopts a similar structure. It goes like this... (For further discussion see Ch 14 in the textbook.)

- Introduction
- Literature Review*
- Thesis*
- Methods*

- Evidence/Supporting Arguments
- Conclusion
- End matter

 May be combined with each other or placed in the introduction, depending upon their length.*

Criteria

For the final draft, length is the least important aspect. Having said this, I would suggest a target length of about 10 pages, single-space. Please submit all drafts in Microsoft Word or PDF.

Here are the criteria we will use to evaluate the finished product. (For further discussion of these points, see Ch 14 in the textbook.)

- Is there a thesis and is it clearly stated?
- Is the thesis significant? Does it matter?
- Is the thesis adequately argued or proven (within the constraints imposed by time, resources, and available sources)?
- Is the study innovative with respect to theory, method, or findings? Does it expand our knowledge of the chosen subject relative to extant work? (This is what your review of the literature should accomplish.)
- Is the essay well-written, i.e., cogently organized, grammatically correct, stylistically elegant, citing all appropriate sources, and not burdened with redundancies or irrelevancies?

LLMs

The advent of large language models such as ChatGPT is introducing changes to how all of us conduct our work. I expect this is the same for university students. For now, there are no university guidelines except the following: “use of AI by students or instructors should always be fully disclosed, including the tool used and the parts of the process it was used in.” We will discuss this further in class.

Collaboration, prior work

Students are encouraged to exchange ideas, sources, and drafts – especially if they are working on related topics. But writing must be done individually. Any sharing of text will be viewed as plagiarism unless it is explicitly cited.

If you are writing a similar paper for another class, or have done so in the past, you must disclose this to the instructor and get approval. If there is too much overlap we will ask you to change topics.

Oral Presentation

You must prepare a talk and PPT presentation that lasts 15-20 minutes. You will sign up for a specific date at the beginning of the semester, and must stick to that date unless you obtain permission to change.

The purpose of the presentation is to present your research, at whatever stage it happens to be at that time. It is understood that those going early in the semester are likely to be at an earlier stage.

The benefits of presenting early on is that you get feedback – from me and from the class – which should help you develop your topic, and you have plenty of time to work on it before the semester ends. However, you must have some idea of what you plan to do; the more specific it is the more helpful our feedback will be.

Because the talk is a condensed version of the paper everything said about the paper (above) applies to the talk. But for the latter, things must be more condensed.

State clearly what you wish to accomplish at the outset. Your second slide (after the title slide) should contain an outline of the talk, and this outline should be logically ordered – just like an outline for a research paper.

One of the early slides should clearly state the research question that you wish to pursue. Ideally, this is followed by a specific hypothesis. Later slides should indicate how you plan to address (test, gather evidence for) that research question/hypothesis.

The last slide(s) of the PPT should display a list of the works (books and articles) that you surveyed or will survey – your working bibliography. Please send your PPT to my email on the day you present. (And remember to bring an opening joke, no matter how corny!)

The presentation will be accompanied and followed by questions and discussion from the rest of the class. Those in the audience should act as (constructive) critics. That is, they should offer their own views, especially if at variance with the speaker's views. This is an occasion for a wide-ranging discussion of the problem at-hand (within the available time-constraints). With respect to the presentation itself, audience members should praise the strengths of the presentation while also pointing out ambiguities and weaknesses, and giving specific feedback on the proposed topic. How can the presenter achieve his/her goals? Is it a tractable topic? (Is it too big, or too small?) What evidence might be helpful?

The audience is a crucial element of the presentation. I expect you to engage with the speaker and the topic, perhaps bringing your own research into the discussion. Note that all of the topics for this class overlap, so you may know something about the speaker's topic that s/he does not.

For further tips, see Chapter 15 of the textbook.

Assistance

Three places to look for assistance...

1. Gerring and Christenson, An Applied Guide to Social Science Methodology, chs 11-12, 14.
2. UT Writing center (schedule an appt online: <https://uwc.utexas.edu/>)
3. Your professor and TA. We will offer feedback when you present your project to the class and when you hand in your rough draft. However, it is strongly advised to check in with us at other points in the semester – particularly at the beginning, as you work towards a topic, and after you have completed the rough draft and received our feedback.

UNIVERSITY RESOURCES

Sanger Learning Center

More than one-third of UT undergraduate students use the Sanger Learning Center each year to improve their academic performance. All students are welcome to take advantage of Sanger Center's classes and workshops, private learning specialist appointments, peer academic coaching, and tutoring for more than 70 courses in 15 different subject areas. Proposition: The root problem of American politics is in its cultural divisions – gender, race, religion, ethnicity, immigration, and urban v. rural – which structure political competition in an invidious fashion. VII. ELECTORAL LAW AND GEOGRAPHY

Proposition: The roots of dysfunction in American politics are to be found in the interaction of electoral rules and electoral geography. Here, we consider the intertwined topics of gerrymandering, over-representation of rural areas, first-past-the-post rules, and the electoral college.

VIII. CANDIDATE SELECTION AND POLITICAL PARTIES

Proposition: The root problem of American politics is not that political parties are too strong but rather that they are too weak. This manifests itself most importantly in the task of candidate selection, the defining function of political parties. The current process appears to be governed by money, special interests, new media, and populist tactics, and favors candidates who are ideologically extreme and perhaps charismatic (at least to their core supporters), but ill-prepared to govern.

IX. MEDIA AND PUBLIC OPINION

Proposition: The root problem of American politics is to be found in changes within the media – the rise of cable television, blogs, Youtube, social media (Twitter, Facebook), and other venues that favor “narrow-casting” over “broad-casting” and that give candidates, activists, and public officials direct access to voters and donors.

XII. CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES, AMERICAN EXCEPTIONALISM

Proposition: The root problem of American politics is the fragmentation of political power, leading to the incapacity of its government – and of Congress in particular – to handle pressing policy needs (e.g., infrastructure, health care, education). Within the halls of government we find increasing inter-party conflict; a focus on scoring points, finger-pointing, passing the buck; symbolic gestures rather than policymaking; and a loss of comity. All of this might be traced, in some degree, to the structure of the US Constitution.
